

Project Archaeology: Investigating Shelter Archaeology of the Colonial Chesapeake

Workshop for Upper Elementary Teachers

June 29, 30, and July 1, 2009
8:30 - 3:00 p.m.

Join us for an exciting trip back in time as we explore the archaeology of the 17th century Chesapeake. Through archaeological investigation of the King's Reach earthfast house in Calvert County, Maryland, learn what artifacts reveal about the lifestyle of a tobacco planter and his family. Follow archaeologists through the analysis of artifacts, historic structures, and human skeletal remains. Practice basic scientific inquiry (observation, inference, evidence and classification) using authentic archaeological data. Explore the ethics of conducting scientific research on past cultures and engage in civic dialogue using the information gained through genuine inquiry. The workshop includes a curator-led tour of the new Smithsonian exhibit Written in Bone: Forensic Files of the 17th Century Chesapeake.

As an interdisciplinary science, archaeology offers innovative and exciting opportunities to integrate math, science and the social studies. Inherently interesting to people of all ages, archaeology is an excellent tool for engaging youth in science and social studies education.

Participants will receive full instruction in archaeological science for the classroom and Project Archaeology: Investigating Shelter, a complete curriculum guide that is endorsed by the National Council for the Social Studies (www.NCSS.org).
